CRYPTO & COFFEE

Risk on mode was evident across both crypto and non-crypto markets, as market participants reacted positively to signs that coronavirus outbreaks have started to stabilise in some of the worst-affected countries, mainly continental Europe. However, the bid tone by equity markets failed to dent investor appetite for safe haven assets such as gold, which traded up over 1%.

For Bitcoin, it was more of a continuation of the trend that started last week and this time, Bitcoin's attempt to break above $7,000 was much more resolute. So much so that unlike last time, the break above $7,000 did not trigger a round of stops as market participants largely envisaged the move higher. The futures curve continued to extend contango widening, supporting the notion that bullish sentiment is returning.

Yet again, Ethereum outperformed Bitcoin, with options market seemingly more bullish on Ethereum than Bitcoin at the moment.

The latest move higher has pushed Bitcoin to being flat year-to-date, while Ethereum is now up 17%. However not all is lost for Bitcoin and according to latest estimates, the next mining difficulty is expected to result in an upward adjustment, which is positive for the network growth.
