CRYPTO &amp; COFFEE

The market traded broadly lower, seemingly unable to shake off the dramatic price collapse that took place the previous day and brought the spot price back below $10,000 level. What is interesting is that despite the painful correction, the futures curve has remained in contango, although the delta has narrowed off the recent levels.

In addition, the price action in the options space is yet to indicate a major reversal in sentiment, even though the skew did shift slightly higher. However, it is the sticky cost of liquidity that is most concerning and this stickiness has been most evident not on BitMEX, which suffered huge liquidations as a result, but on Deribit.

In terms of news flow, CoinDesk writes that renewable energy services provider WPO has won approval from the French financial markets regulator to raise funding through a public token offering, or ICO. The Autorite des Marches Financiers (AMF) granted the ICO approval under its "ICO visa" scheme on May 12, which is expected to run from September 8 through to November 12.

Elsewhere, VanEck company MVIS and cryptocurrency data provider CryptoCompare are launching an hourly Bitcoin (BTC) Benchmark Rate, which has been developed in close cooperation with cryptocurrency bank SEBA.
