The market traded broadly lower, with Bitcoin testing $11,000 level to the downside, while Ethereum continued to underperform and traded lower by almost 10% as market participants were seen booking profits heading into the final few days of the month.

On that note, even with the MVIS large and small cap indices down 4.5% and 5.6% respectively, the aforementioned indices are still up 16% and 11%. Year-to-date (YTD), small caps have outperformed large cap peers, up 72% vs up 65%. However, the show was stolen by the mid-cap assets, with YTD return of 92%.

Elsewhere, equity markets continued to edge higher ahead of the eagerly awaited Fed Chairman Jerome Powell speech this Thursday during a virtual version of the Fed's annual Jackson Hole, Wyoming, conference. The Chairman of the Fed is expected to outline what could be the central bank's most active efforts ever to spur inflation back to a healthy level, with CNBC writing citing analysts that it is likely that the phase such as "average inflation" targeting may be used.

Said otherwise, the Fed will allow inflation to run higher than normal for a period of time. The reason why the conference matters for crypto markets is likely impact it will have on the widely followed Bitcoin vs gold correlation metric.
