The upside steadied a bit over the weekend as Bitcoin briefly traded above $14,000 level before subsequently retracing into the mid-$13,000 zone in early Monday morning.

Given the surge over the month of October, at the time when equity markets faltered ahead of the US elections, it will be particularly interesting to see how Bitcoin behaves once the results are made public. If one goes by the narrative that uncertainty over the elections in the US was one of the main upside drivers, then, by default, the resolution of this event should result in an unwind and thus some downside risk for Bitcoin.

On that note, the FT reported that Donald Trump has threatened pre-emptive legal action against the US vote result, as polls showed the president lagging behind Democrat Joe Biden with just 48 hours until polls close.

Speaking to reporters on Sunday evening, Mr Trump denied a report that he was preparing to declare victory on election night before the country had received an official vote count. But he claimed there was potential for “fraud” and “misuse” in the vote counts for Pennsylvania and Nevada — two swing states that have Democratic governors.
